

Revealed: The PSBJ's inaugural Power 100 leaders who define what the region has become

The founder of a real estate development company whose most recent completion is F5 Tower, the fifth tallest building in Seattle. He is known for his historic preservation work. Among the projects he has worked on are turning the 1912 Sears catalog fulfillment center into Starbucks' headquarters and restoring Union Station, now the headquarters of Sound Transit.

PSBJ

The influence that resides in our region is undeniable.

The two wealthiest people in the world, Jeff Bezos and Bill Gates, call the Seattle area home. And the Puget Sound region is home to 12 Fortune 500 companies.

As the Business Journal prepared its Power 100, the objective was to identify those who define what the region has become and reflect its lineage.

These people have built iconic companies on a global scale. They are influencers, innovators and luminaries in their respective fields.

The Business Journal's leadership team solicited insights from the business community to craft the Power 100. We looked for leaders who are representative of their industries and carry the clout to shape those industries. This list is dynamic and follows the news. Many of the Power 100 were newsmakers this year, and this list is certain to change next year.

These discussions became an ideal starting point for our Executive of the Year selection process. One of these 100 individuals will earn that distinction, which will be revealed in the coming weeks. Last year, we awarded our first posthumous Executive of the Year to Paul Allen, who died Oct. 15, 2018, at the age of 65. In 2017 the honor went to Amazon's John Schoettler.

Biotech leaders are well represented, but that's the extent of the science behind this Power 100. This is not a ranking; rather it's a roster that aims to reflect this moment in time.